romskeIn the 20th Century, the “state” became a dominant factor in economic life. Government encouraged and regulated private enterprise, whereas previously, the reverse had been true. Under capitalism, national boundaries had been largely irrelevant, as people moved freely within and between countries in search of jobs and investment opportunities. The national state is now a threat to economic freedom, and this global tendency is intensifying. National borders are being increasingly respected in the sphere of international trade, but increasingly less so in matters of immigration. Nation states have become more powerful, and governments have become more intrusive. What needs to be developed is a counter to the statist bias of the conventional left. And what should it be? In a freely competitive world, which needs a mechanism to discipline unscrupulous governments? One obvious answer is the system of global private courts. The national courts have become, or should become, merely administrative bodies, subordinate to global jurists.

The global courts are as much needed now as they were in the past, when the Roman Empire was strong and the Church of England the great authority. The European Union, dominated by big business, was originally conceived by national governments with the intention of regulating the economy in the interests of national citizens. Today, economic life has become more international, and politicians have become less concerned with the interests of their own people. The EU is becoming a corrupt corporate state, an effective alternative for business to authoritarian regimes that provide generous subsidies. The system of international private courts will also help to replace the patent system, which is constantly being tightened in an attempt to protect corporate enterprises from cheap knockoffs. The enforcement of copyright in global courts would also be an effective alternative to the dreaded IP rights. Under copyright, all books are the property of a single nation state, which fails to recognize the reality of electronic distribution. The market failure of the patent system is even more obvious in the internet age. The patented information, whether spreadsheets, recipes, or theoretical physics, is at the mercy of the egoism of those who wish to monopolize it. Corporations will defend their patents, but there should be a mechanism to regulate the patent system, one that the state does not have the resources to enforce. The patent system is failing, but it is too late for the state to take direct action. Its role should be to promote better regulation of the patent system, the way international private courts promote better regulation of international trade. The f678ea9f9e
